ABSTRACT

The purpose of this report is to make available import and export statistics for salmon trade and give a brief summary of current issues in salmon production, consumption, and trade. The body of the text includes discussion of the increased salmon production coming from pen-rearing as well as wild catches. The appendix includes tables of salmon trade flows for the United States, Canada, Norway, Japan, United Kingdom, Belgium, France, and the Netherlands. Most tables include up to 1987 data, with 1988 data used in the text if they were available.

Salmon production has undergone a rapid transformation with the influx of pen-reared salmon in the 1980s. Norway, the largest pen-reared salmon supplier, now exports more to the European Economic Community (EEC) than does the United States. The United States, which is the largest salmon producer and exporter in the world, now imports approximately as much salmon as it produces for domestic consumption.

Japan is the largest consumer of salmon, preferring the sockeye salmon of the United States and Canada to all other species. Most of Japan's salmon production originates from the United States Pacific salmon (Oncorhynchus spp.) fishery. The Atlantic salmon (Salmo salar) is the preferred farmed species but has yet to make significant inroads into the Japanese market.

In Europe, both Atlantic and Pacific salmon are imported in the fresh or frozen product form to be mainly processed into smoked salmon. The only significant salmon production in the EEC comes from pen-reared salmon in Scotland and Ireland. Much of the EEC trade is imported salmon which is then processed and re-exported duty-free.

This report is descriptive in nature, motivated by the increased interest in salmon due to increased salmon aquaculture. It is hoped that this publication will disseminate statistics and references, and raise issues to help future researchers as they examine world salmon markets.

INTRODUCTION

With the spectacular proliferation of pen-raised salmon (Oncorhynchus spp. and Salmo salar) aquaculture, increased attention has been directed toward world salmon markets. Salmon aquaculture is among the most important technological advances in fisheries in this decade. With the influx of this new and increasing supply of salmon, North American analysts have become interested in the effects the increased supply of farmed salmon will have on the world salmon markets. Because salmon is traded heavily in international markets, it is important to examine trade statistics from producers and traders of salmon when assessing the condition of salmon markets in the future.

The object of this report is to disseminate trade statistics from 1982 to 1987 and briefly describe salmon markets as they are today, paying special attention to pen-raised salmon. Much of this data is not readily available to the public, particularly information regarding exports from the United Kingdom, France, the Netherlands, Belgium, and to some extent Japan. All data except the Norwegian data were made available to the National Marine Fisheries Service (NMFS) from Data Research Incorporated (DRI) of Lexington, Massachusetts. U.S. trade data are from the U.S. Import/Export Data Base derived by the Fisheries Statistics Division of U.S. Department of Commerce, NMFS, from Commerce's Bureau of the Census information. The Norwegian data are made available through the Norwegian Central Bureau of Statistics. The authors tabulated and summarized all information,

The following report includes a general discussion of salmon aquaculture, world salmon supply, trading patterns, and data sources, and an appendix containing export/import data tables.

SALMON AQUACULTURE

In countries with the most commercially significant aquaculture, salmon are reared in enclosed net-pens anchored in the ocean. The most successful country in this endeavor has been Norway, which raised 176 million pounds of Atlantic salmon (Salmo salar) in 1988 (see Tables 1 and 2 below).

The increase in world salmon aquaculture has been dramatic. From 1982 to 1988, the world production of cultured salmon (including land-based aquaculture and salmon ranching) has increased over 800%. In 1980, salmon aquaculture accounted for 1% of the total world salmon production; it is projected to account for 29% of the total world salmon production by 1990 (Table 3). These numbers are even more dramatic when compared to the North American catch of the higher-valued species of <sup>a</sup>In Pacific Fishing (March 1990), Ken Talley reported that Norwegian harvests of 44 million pounds of the original estimated harvest of 286 million pounds was held through the winter to be harvested in 1990 which raised 1990's projected harvest of 308 million pounds to 352 million pounds.

<sup>b</sup>In Pacific Fishing (March 1990), Ken Talley reported that Norway purchased from the farmers 88 million pounds-of Atlantic salmon to be frozen and stored in inventory. If all. this salmon is not marketed--in 1990, then Norway's estimated marketed production would be 264,552 and the world's total marketed production would be 530,812.

Pacific salmon (chinook, O. tshawytscha; coho, O. kisutch; and sockeye, O. nerka), which may be the salmon species most likely to substitute for the widely farmed Atlantic salmon. By 1990 the volume of farmed salmon production is projected to be comparable to 60 to 80% of the total North American catch and will exceed the North American catch of chinook, coho, and sockeye salmon by 40 to 60% (Herrmann 1990). These figures are extremely tentative because of the difficulty in forecasting the wild catch and the rapid changes taking place in farmed salmon supplies due to soft prices in 1990.

Most of the Japanese-farmed salmon is pan-sized coho, salmon which is consumed domestically. Most U.K. salmon aquaculture production is Atlantic salmon, of which about 50% is consumed domestically. Most of the salmon raised in Canada (primarily chinook and coho) and in Chile (mainly coho) are exported. Aquaculture operations in Ireland and the Faroe Islands produce Atlantic salmon which are mainly exported. Iceland's main production comes from ocean ranching of Atlantic salmon which is also mainly exported (Herrmann 1990).

The United States pen-raised salmon come from two states: Maine and Washington. In Maine, Ocean Products, with an investment of $10 million, is projecting 7 million pounds by the end of 1990 (Redmayne 1988). In Washington, salmon are grown in Puget Sound, and the two main products are pan-sized coho and Atlantic salmon. Prospects for increased production of Puget Sound Atlantic salmon are very good if opposition to the farms can be overcome. (At present, salmon farmers must confront objections on aesthetic, environmental, and political grounds as well as the market concerns of commercial fishermen.)

Atlantic salmon is the preferred pen-raising species because it is easy to handle and has a comparatively low mortality rate once past the smolt stage. As the following information shows, Atlantic salmon is the dominant farmed species, accounting for between 75 and 85% of all farmed salmon in the last 5 years (figures for 1988-90 are estimates) (U.S. Dep. Commer. 1987; Herrmann 1990):

WORLD SUPPLY OF CAPTURED SALMON

The world supply of caught salmon is dominated by the United States, Canada, Japan, and the U.S.S.R. When the United States and Canada are combined as "North America," the pooled catches account for the greatest percentages of every species of salmon with the exception of chum salmon (O. keta). North America captures 90% of the three highest valued salmon species (chinook, coho, and sockeye) and 61% of all Pacific salmon (see Table 4). Because many countries in the late 1970s extended their coastal jurisdiction to 200 miles, the Japanese salmon catches have been declining. The Japanese salmon harvest continues to decrease slightly as the U.S.S.R. and the United States continue reducing Japanese harvest quotas of salmon in their waters.

Chum and pink (O. gorbuscha) salmon, the lower-valued salmon species, account for 69% of the world's caught salmon in quantity (see Table 5). Sockeye salmon is the highest-valued species in the United States, and chinook salmon is second in terms of ex-vessel value (see Table 6).

Catches of salmon are by no means stable over the years. Biological and environmental fluctuations, as well as political decisions regarding hatchery operations and fishing policies, greatly influence the amount of returning and caught salmon. Most salmon fishing is regulated by catch quotas set by state and federal governments, and these quotas are subject to change during a given fishing season. Table 7 shows the total amount of salmon caught by the United States and Canada from 1983 to 1988.

Comparing the levels of world farmed salmon production to the North American catch, it is easy to see the potentially significant effect that pen-raised salmon could have on North American salmon markets. Figures 1 and 2 compare the total amount of pen-raised salmon to the North American catches of all salmon and to the North American catches of only chinook and coho salmon, respectively.

WORLD SALMON TRADE

The United States and Canada are the major exporters of Pacific salmon, with Japan and the European Economic Community (EEC) the leading importers. (EEC member countries include Belgium, Denmark, France, Italy, Luxemborg, the Netherlands, Greece, Ireland, Portugal, Spain, United Kingdom, and West Germany.) Norway is the leading exporter of farmed Atlantic salmon, while the EEC and the United States are the major recipients. This section discusses the highlights of salmon trade flows among major suppliers and recipients.

U.S. Exports of Fresh and Frozen Salmon

In 1988, the United States exported 294 million pounds of fresh and frozen whole or eviscerated salmon worth $830 million. In the same year, exports of fresh and frozen salmon, fillets, steaks, or portions, accounted for 1.7 million pounds of exports worth $4.5 million (U.S. Dep. Commer. 1989a). Imported salmon may be smoked, salted, pickled, steaked, filleted, or canned, U.S. exports are summarized in Table 8.

The most important of the fresh and frozen export species by volume and economic importance is sockeye salmon, valued at $496 million in 1988. In that year, the United States exported 135 million pounds of fresh and frozen sockeye salmon to Japan, worth $484 million. Japan is the dominant U.S. export market for all fresh and frozen salmon, importing over 60% of every species. Japan's total imports of U.S. salmon were 238 million pounds, or 82% of total U.S. fresh and frozen salmon exports (U.S. Dep. Commer. 1989a). The EEC countries, Sweden, and Switzerland import the bulk of the rest of the U.S. fresh and frozen salmon exports (see Table 9).

Norwegian Exports of Fresh and Frozen Salmon

The majority of the U.S. fresh and frozen salmon exports to the EEC is destined for the smoked salmon markets, where it competes with farmed salmon, mainly from Norway and Scotland. Norwegian exports to the EEC are particularly worrisome to U.S. salmon producers and exporters. Approximately 85-90% of Norway's production of salmon is exported, and the exports are top-quality farmed salmon. Table 10 shows Norwegian exports of fresh and frozen farmed Atlantic salmon.

Among the European countries, France is the biggest importer, importing nearly 40 million pounds of Norwegian fresh and frozen salmon in 1988. Norway now exports more salmon to EEC countries than does the United States. This is due in part to an expansion of the EEC market for salmon and in part from a shift in U.S. exports from the EEC to Japan due to the Norwegian competition. In 1988, Norway exported 107 million pounds of fresh and frozen salmon to EEC countries, compared to U.S. exports of approximately 35 million pounds.

Norway's exports are highly seasonal; exporters take advantage of demand during the holiday seasons in the EEC and try to avoid the peak Pacific salmon fishing seasons. As shown below, nearly 30% of all fresh Norwegian exports are exported in November and December, while only 5% are exported during North America's biggest salmon fishing month of August (Norwegian Central Bureau of Statistics 1987-88):

U.S. Exports of Canned Salmon

For canned salmon, the United Kingdom was the United States largest export market, importing half of all U.S. exports of canned salmon in 1988. In terms of quantity and total value, the largest 1988 exports of canned salmon were pink salmon. However, canned sockeye salmon had the highest price (see Tables 11 and 12).

With consumers' increased awareness about healthy lifestyles and their perception that fresh and frozen salmon are healthier than the canned product, canned salmon is diminishing in importance to the United States. Only pink salmon is currently sold more in canned form than in fresh and frozen forms. As recently as 1971, the majority of sockeye, chum, pink, and coho were all being sold in canned rather than in fresh or frozen form (see Table 13).

Canadian Exports

The bulk of Canadian exports of frozen chinook salmon goes to the United States: the majority of frozen chum and coho salmon are shipped to the EEC, while the largest share of frozen sockeye salmon is sent to Japan. Pink salmon exports from Canada are not reported. The bulk of canned pink and chum salmon goes to the EEC, while the majority of canned sockeye is sent to France. Table 14 shows Canada's 1987 exports in pounds and U.S. dollars.

United Kingdom Exports

The United Kingdom is the biggest exporter of pen-raised salmon in the EEC. About 50% of the total U.K. salmon production is consumed domestically and the rest is exported. Tables 15 and 16 summarize the exports of U.K. salmon by country for 1986, and in total for 1982-86, respectively. Fresh Atlantic salmon is mainly from Scotland: smoked salmon is Scottish in origin or re-exported Pacific salmon. U.K. exports of fresh salmon rose 580% from 1982 to 1986, and the U.K.'s 70% pounds of canned salmon exports, which were mainly processed from Pacific salmon imports.

Tariffs

Canadian, U.S., and Norwegian salmon are mainly exported as fresh or frozen whole fish because of the high duty rates on processed salmon. Most of the salmon in the EEC is not consumed fresh or frozen, but rather is smoked. In the 1980s, France, the largest EEC market, has consumed 70 to 90% of all its Pacific salmon smoked (Monfort 1988). Over 50% of the Atlantic salmon imported to France are also smoked. Denmark prefers to import raw pen-raised Atlantic and wild Pacific salmon to smoke; most Danish smoked salmon is exported to other EEC countries. Much of the Atlantic and Pacific salmon exported to EEC countries is processed and re-exported. This is due to the fact that although the EEC has high tariffs on processed salmon, the product is traded without tariffs among EEC members (see Table 17 below). Most pen-raised salmon is exported fresh, but demand is increasing for frozen imports because processors can store the salmon in inventory and smoke it when demand is high. Nearly all U.S. exports are frozen.

U.S. Imports

With the emergence of pen-raised salmon production, U.S. imports of salmon have increased dramatically in the off-season for Pacific fishing (see Table 18) due to the demand for fresh salmon, dominated by east coast restaurant demand. Until the emergence of pen-raised salmon, most U.S. imports were fresh Canadian chinook, coho, and chum salmon. In, 1982, the United States imported just one million pounds of Atlantic salmon from Norway; whereas in 1988, the United States imported 20 million pounds of Norwegian farmed salmon. In 1988, the United States was the third largest market for Norwegian salmon, behind France and Denmark.

As shown in Table 19, most fresh imports come from Canada and Norway, although significant amounts of pen-raised salmon are also imported from Chile. The east coast utilizes most of the Norwegian salmon, with New York City accounting for 50% of total Norwegian imports in 1986. Boston accounted for nearly 50% of Scottish and Irish imports in 1986. Los Angeles accounted for 40% of Chilean imports and Seattle accounted for 90% of Canadian imports (Anderson and Hurst 1987). Nearly all imports from countries other than Canada are farmed, with the fresh Canadian imports being a mixture of farmed and caught salmon and the frozen Canadian imports being caught salmon.

Seventy-eight percent of U.S. imports were fresh salmon in 1988. In terms of quantity, Canada is still the biggest exporter to the United States supplying almost 24 million pounds in 1988 with Norway a close second, supplying 20 million pounds. In terms of value, Norway is by far the leading exporter to the United States. However, price is highest for the Scottish salmon imports. If Peyton's (1988) U.S. consumption figures of 88 million pounds of fresh and frozen salmon for 1987 are accurate, then approximately 48% of all U.S. fresh and frozen salmon consumption is imported and the value may be higher. In 1982, only 12% of all U.S. fresh and frozen consumption was imported. U.S. imports of fresh and frozen salmon have increased 385% from 1982 to 1988 with fresh salmon imports alone increasing 618%.

The imports from Scotland and Norway are farmed Atlantic salmon, whereas imports from other countries are farmed chinook and coho salmon and all species of ocean-caught Pacific salmon.

Japanese Consumption and Imports

Japan leads the world in terms of total fish and salmon consumption, consuming more than one-half of the annual world salmon supply. For this reason, consumption patterns for this market will be discussed in more detail, in contrast to other markets. Japan's 1987 consumption of salmon was approximately 610 million pounds (Tashiro 1988). Seafood has traditionally been an important source of protein in Japan. Historically, most fish was consumed as a salted commodity because salted fish had a longer shelf life before refrigeration was prevalent. Salmon, which is still mainly consumed in the salted form, is the second most consumed fish in Japan in terms of quantity and the first in terms of value (see Table 20) (Kikuchi 1987).

Most Japanese salmon is filleted. Filleted salted salmon is easy to prepare and need not be eaten the same day it is purchased. Filleted salmon can be eaten without bothering with bones or skin, and there is very little waste. With more Japanese entering the work force, ease of cooking is becoming a more important consideration in food purchases. Traditionally, a Japanese meal has consisted of rice and a side dish. A popular Japanese breakfast, and sometimes lunch, consisted of salted salmon, baked salmon, and plain rice (Kikuchi 1987). However, the Japanese meal is changing; with the younger generation becoming more Westernized, meals of rice and a side dish are being replaced by more breads and pastas and red meat (Kikuchi et al. 1988). This will diminish the demand for salted salmon as will the fact that consumers are preferring a less salted taste in their meats (Tashiro 1988). As refrigeration becomes more prevalent, more frozen fillets are being sold.

Besides salted and filleted frozen salmon, the Japanese consume salmon smoked and in sushi, two high-valued product forms. Generally, Canadian salmon is preferred for these two markets because Canadian sockeye salmon is perceived to be of higher quality because it has a higher fat content and a redder flesh than Bristol Bay sockeye (Leitz and Wright 1988). Recently, a higher demand has developed for Norwegian-salmon for the smoking market because it is a stable, high-quality product (Tashiro 1988).

The Japanese are perhaps the most quality-conscious consumers in the world and require certain attributes of their food. As with beef, the Japanese prefer the fattier salmon of the Pacific Coast. They also like the deep red muscle of sockeye. and coho salmon. One of the problems in marketing Canadian farmed coho and chinook salmon in Japan is that the muscle of these fish, does not have the deep red color that the Japanese prefer (Anderson and Hurst 1987). The most heavily consumed salmon in Japan is sockeye. Japan imports over half of North America's sockeye catch. In 1987, the Japanese landed 3.7 million pounds of sockeye salmon in the high seas fishery and imported 130 million pounds of sockeye salmon from North America.

Despite Japan's preference for high quality salmon, a market has grown for lower quality salmon, especially domestically caught chum salmon. These salmon may be fried in the filleted form, ground into salmon burgers, or flaked for a complement to plain rice (Kikuchi 1987). The demand for canned salmon is very small in Japan. For almost all forms of final salmon consumption other than fresh and frozen, frozen Pacific salmon and fresh and frozen Atlantic salmon are used as raw material for Japanese processing companies.

There is wide variation in seasonal consumption of salmon in Japan. A survey is taken daily in Japan and aggregated and published monthly. Table 21 shows the quantities and percent of salmon consumed in Japan in various months in 1987.

December salmon expenditures are approximately 140-150% higher than those of other months, This is because in Japan there are large celebrations for the New Year Holiday which include traditional feasting. High quality food is bought with money from paychecks that are often 50% more for Japanese workers in December due to end-of-year bonuses (Herrmann et al. 1989).

European Economic Community Imports and Consumption

The EEC imports most of the remaining North American salmon, with France consuming the most fresh and frozen salmon and the United Kingdom importing the most canned salmon. Most salmon traded between EEC countries is imported fresh or frozen, and then traded fresh, frozen, or smoked. As newcomers to the EEC (1985), Spain and Portugal still have higher tariff rates (until 1993) on most forms of salmon than the rest of the EEC (see Table 17), and most exports to these two countries are re-exports through other EEC countries. Spain has a 0.5% tariff on fresh whole fish, 4.5% on fresh fillets, 4.5% on salted fish, and 10.4% on frozen fish. Portugal has a 18.5% tariff on fresh-frozen whole fish, 22.5% on fresh fillet, 21.8% on frozen fillets, and 17.8% on salted salmon (U.S. Dep. Conuner. 1988).

Reports of France's 1985 imports of smoked salmon reveal that re-exportation in the EEC takes place in processed salmon:

Danish smoked salmon is highly desired in France, and this is solely re-exported salmon. Much of the exports from the United Kingdom are smoked Scottish pen-raised Atlantic salmon. The demand for smoked salmon is highly seasonal, peaking during the December holidays as shown below for the household consumption of smoked salmon in France in 1986 (Monfort 1988):

(Note that Period 4 was the Easter holiday period in 1986.)

France is the most important market for salmon in the EEC and the world's third most important salmon market behind Japan and the United States, consuming approximately 77 million pounds of salmon in 1986. France produces only a little over 0.5 million pounds annually; its salmon consumption is almost all from imports. These are primarily frozen whole from North America, fresh or frozen from Norway, and smoked from the United Kingdom and Denmark (Monfort 1988). Overall, seafood demand in France is increasing at about 5% annually motivated by a concern about eating more healthful foods and a perception that seafood is a healthful food (Miller 1986a).

In France, the Norwegian, Danish, Irish, and Scottish Atlantic salmon are the first choice of consumers for taste. Of the Pacific salmon species, the French prefer chinook and coho. Experts believe that increased imports of Atlantic salmon will affect the demand for coho salmon but that chinook salmon, with its high oil content and loyal clientele, may not be affected to a large extent (Anderson and Hurst 1987). Smoked salmon is traditionally consumed in France as an appetizer at home or in restaurants. It is usually served in long, thin slices with lemon and warm toast (Monfort 1988).

Of the fresh and frozen salmon consumed in France, the cuts are whole fish, slices, or fillets. Small size chum and pink salmon are also sold for ready-made frozen meals (Monfort 1988).

The French market for canned salmon is small, with an estimated annual consumption of only about 8 million pounds, most of which is chum salmon. As in other countries, canned salmon is not perceived to be as nutritionally wholesome. as fresh, frozen, or smoked salmon (Monfort 1988).

Salmon products, especially smoked and higher valued species, are thought to be a luxury in France. They are thought to compete with such highly valued foods as smoked oysters, fresh fruits, and other smoked fish for appetizers and a range of red and white meats when served as a main course (Monfort 1988; Shaw and Muir 1987).

The United Kingdom is the largest European market for canned salmon, certainly being the most important market for U.S. canned exports. Twelve percent of all U.K. seafood is consumed in the canned form (Miller 1986b). Sockeye salmon is the preferred canned species because of its color and oil content, but high prices for sockeye salmon increase the demand for chum and pink salmon. Canned salmon is popular for use in salads and sandwiches., particularly in afternoon teas (Lent 1984). This demand strengthens during the summer months.

Much of the consumption of domestic noncanned salmon in the--United Kingdom has been taken over by Scotland-raised, salmon. The U.K.. consumers prefer smoked Atlantic salmon to smoked Pacific salmon. In 1984, the 65 Scottish fish smokers switched from using mostly Pacific salmon to using Atlantic salmon, and the Irish are following suit. The preference is first for Scottish-raised Atlantic salmon, followed by those from Norway. About 50% of Scotland's fresh salmon eventually ends up in the United Kingdom to be consumed as fresh, frozen, or smoked salmon (Fitzgerald 1987).

Other European Economic Community Countries and Sweden

Seventy-five percent of the salmon imported by Germany is smoked. The Germans prefer troll-caught chinook, coho, and Atlantic salmon for curing. Some of the smoked fish is re-exported, but in smaller quantities than from France.

Denmark imports large amounts of highly valued Pacific salmon and Atlantic salmon for smoking and re-exporting. Danish smoked salmon is very popular in the EEC.

Sweden is another growing salmon market. Pink and chum salmon are imported for sale in retail stores in whole or roast form. Smoked and pickled salmon are also processed in Sweden (Lent 1984).

DATA DISCUSSION

All of the data discussed in this report, except that for Norway and the United States, were compiled from data provided to the National Marine Fisheries Service by Data Research Incorporated. The Norwegian data were purchased from the Norwegian Central Bureau of Statistics; some of this data may have been compiled from other sources. The Canadian data may be purchased from Statistics Canada and the U.S data from the Department of Commerce, Bureau of Census.

A number of characteristics of the data should be noted, and we will highlight some of them here. First, weights and values are shown in different units of measurement depending on the country (e.g., the U.S. data are in pounds and U.S. dollars, while the Canadian data are in metric tons and Canadian dollars), Exchange rates are given separately in Table A-58.

The prices in the Canadian data are in Canadian dollars per pound. When interpreting these prices, which the authors calculated by dividing value by quantity, one should exercise caution because quantities are rounded to metric tons, so at low quantities the computed prices may be inaccurate.

The Norwegian data are for 1982-87. The remainder of the export/import data are from 1982 to June of 1987. Data from the EEC, Japan, and Canada for July through December of 1987 were not tabulated because they were deemed by the authors to be highly inaccurate. For this reason, data for Canada for July through December 1987 were taken from Statistics Canada.

There are also some missing observations. For June 1986, observations are missing for Belgian exports of smoked and canned salmon and Belgian imports of fresh, frozen, smoked, and canned salmon. Observations are missing for the French imports of fresh salmon for January and February of 1986. Observations are missing for June of 1986 for the Netherlands imports of smoked and canned salmon.
